Wheeling, will be understood from the following description of it, the items of which are derived from the report of the engineer, Mr. Charles Ellet, pr.—

The span of the bridge is 1,010 feet from ecutive country to the supporting towers, being 152 feet longer than the celebrated Freibourg bridge, which is the greatest span heretofore constructed. The height of the flooring, at its greatest elevation, is 97 feet above the low-water level of the Osito, giving an elevation of 52 feet above the great flood of 1882, and 58 feet above any other known rise of the stream; a stage of water, by the way, that it is so seldom attained, and when attained is nother a sweeping off of wood-piles, &c.; so that all references to and comsarisons with it are matters rather of curiosity than of practical utility. On a rise of 20 feet above low-water there will be an elevation of 77 feet from the surface of the water to the floor of the bridge.

The summit of the eastern tower is 153 feet above and of the sastern tower is 153 feet above and the general flooring and the great flooring and th

The summit of the eastern tower is 153\[ 153\] feet above low water, and 60 feet above the abutment by which it is supported. The flooring is 24 feet wide, with two foot ways, each 3\[ 124\] feet, and an intermediate carriage way 17 feet wide. The flooring is supported by 12 cables of iron wire, 4 inches in diameter, and 1,380 feet long. These cables rest on iron rollers, placed on the summits of the turners the maxements of which will relieve the latest tests.

A column of 16 of the six-horse wagons used on the National road would fill the length of the span from one abutment to the other.
